New River Art 2013 enters the digital age

By Gerri Young

This year marked the return of the New River Art Juried Biennial to the task list of the Blacksburg Regional Art Association (BRAA). It is the 12th exhibition held under this name and is managed by BRAA every six years. In between, the show is held by Jacksonville Center for the Arts in Floyd and the Pulaski Fine Arts Center of the New River Valley.

The BRAA team coordinating the 2013 show consists of Leslye Bloom, artist and seasoned veteran of the show planning; Diana Francis, marketing and gallery manager for The Creekmore Law Firm in Blacksburg and myself, artist normally entering, not planning, exhibitions.

I thought it would be something good to learn; all the ins and outs of planning a show. "It's not too much work," said Bloom.

Yeah, right.

Working on the biennial made it impossible to write a feature story for this month's newsletter. Too hard to get my subject, do the interview, line up Teri Hoover, my trusty photographer friend and BRAA member, write the article, etc., etc.

After all, what else was there to do besides simultaneously handling the first BRAA exhibit at the Jacksonville Center?

Biennial parking planning for winners delivering their work to Perspective Gallery, gathering and preparing mailing labels for the marketing postcard, writing a letter to our sponsors and donors to let them know how things were going. Double-checking everything.

211 artworks
were entered 36 pieces
featuring both 2D and 3D were accepted
following detailed consideration and rating by the jurors. A 7-point rating was used
and only works rated 6.0 and higher were invited to the gallery.

Learning what to do with the new computerized system we used for taking entries deserves a lot of close attention, always touched with a bit of fear that something we'd do inside of it would cause everything to disappear into the great unknown, earning us, the Blacksburg artists, the reputation of having un-created this nearly historic, long-awaited event.

We got seriously started working on the planning in early 2013, around February, I think. Visions of piles of paper applications and CDs full of art photos drove us to be innovative and think, surely, by now someone has automated this process. A Google search quickly led us to several choices and, after some consideration; we called the folks at Call for Entry—CaFÉ for short.

The real people behind the system walked us through how it worked in a conference call with the three of us staring at computers. We liked what we saw, bought the deal with New River Art funds and sat down for another conference call with computers to go through an hour of training. When the CaFÉ people weren't personally helping us, we checked out the online guide with step-by-step instructions for everything from entering, loading photos, paying, jurying, notifying artists and more.

Taking this enormous leap into the future of managing exhibitions came with some serious concerns.

Backups? Yes, multiple times a day. Learning curve for the three of us? Yep. Pay for the service? Yep. But the one that made us cringe was what was going to happen when we told our members, "This is it. No paper, no CDs, you enter through CaFÉ or not at all."

Actually, we were nicer about it than that. We didn't force artists to pay online. We let them have one old-fashioned payment option—they could write a check. (Only one out of over 70 did.) They could pay by PayPal or credit card online. Most everyone used the later. I won't tell you who the check writer was, but he lives in Roanoke and paints a whole lot better than he pays online.

We didn't just throw everyone to the wolves for learning the system either. We held a workshop to help members stressed about the process and to test it before announcing to the world that it was live. We put together a PowerPoint presentation with screen shots and detailed instructions. We made test entries ourselves. (None of us entered the competition.)

We allowed probably the longest entry window—four months—in the history of the New River Art show so no one could use the excuse of not having enough time.

It was thrilling to see our first application come in from a teacher in Farmville who would never have known about our show without CaFÉ. It only took her a couple of days to find us, thanks to the "new opportunity" emails CaFÉ sends out to its members.

Artist Tip:

The comment made most often by the jurors regarded poor photo quality. No matter how wonderful your artwork might be, if the photo does not do justice to the work, the juror can have a difficult time rating it as high as it might deserve.

Pat Dews Workshop

Zehmer Hall Conference Center, University of Virginia, Charlottesville

Through daily water media demonstrations, positive critiques, and working beside the students, Dews helps take the "fear out of painting." For more information, contact Patricia Travers at 434-977-3506 or propagule@aol.com.

Plein air in pretty places

Late in the summer, BRAA member Donald Sunshine told of plein air days in his winter home in Florida — a weekly group of painters gathering in different locations to enjoy the pleasure and challenges of painting surrounded by nature.

Since that time, a small group of BRAA artists have enjoyed the same experience in the Blacksburg area.

Places already visited include member Teri Hoover's home and garden on Draper Road. During this summer's area garden tour, this location attracted 500 visitors and even a plein air painter the day of the tour. This wonderful place quickly became the first location for the BRAA plein air group.

Two sessions at Smithfield Plantation have taken place; one organized and one impromptu. This location offers vintage buildings, long views and colonial gardens.

On September 15, the group is scheduled to go to Make-A-Diff Ranch in Newport, thanks to the arrangements made by new BRAA member Ava Howard. On Sept. 25, at 10 a.m. the group will meet at Marie Collier's house at 1100 Deerfield Drive, Blacksburg. She has a lovely long view from the back of her house.

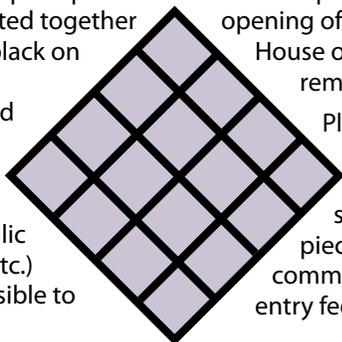

Plein air events are announced through the BRAA Facebook page, on the webpage and through direct email to members. To get on the plein air email group specifically for people interested in plein air painting or drawing, email braaarts@gmail.com.

The events are free and open to all interested artists, not just members.

BRAA artists invited to square off

Art in 16 Squares project announced

Blacksburg's 16 Squares town logo has inspired a project to showcase local artistic talent. Sixteen 12" square pieces will be selected and mounted together "on point" within a larger black on point background. BRAA exhibiting artists are invited to submit a square for jurying. To enhance unity in the overall piece, each square must contain metallic copper (paint, metal, ink, etc.) and a color as close as possible to blue Pantone 2955. All 2-D media are welcome. Entry deadline is March 1, 2014. The project will debut at the opening of the Alexander Black House on May 1, 2014 and will remain until early September.

Please email Paula Golden at paulacgolden@comcast.net to express interest in submitting one or more pieces for this high profile community project. There is no entry fee.

New River Art continued from page 2

Entry #7 brought our first BRAA member into the competition. This lady attended our workshop for terrified entrants and succeeded with flying colors!

Our very last entrant, another BRAA member, was savvy enough to use the system unassisted, but stressed at the very thought of putting her work in the running. She hit the SUBMIT button at 11:59 p.m. on the very edge of the midnight closing.

In all, 22 BRAA members entered; a number I was very happy with and way more than entered the last time the old-fashioned way.

Between opening and closing of the application window, some weeks no one entered and we worried about being the art-less show no one came to.

Then came the deadline month.

Every day someone new or familiar showed up in the entry roster. We entered the system often to see what was happening. I really wanted to hit 100 pieces and was worried we wouldn't make it for a while, but August took care of that. I raised my goal to 125.

The care and helping of our members, and a couple non-members I happen to know, increased.

"My photos won't load, something's wrong with the system."

Nope, something was wrong with their photo size, the most frequent issue encountered. I quickly learned to inquire, "Windows computer or Mac?" On Mac, sizing the photo files is a snap. (Cozy up to Preview in your Applications list.)

"I want to put in five photos of my sculpture." Nope, three per entry and we expected them to be three different artworks. Ok, we'll write the 3D issue on our list of lessons learned to consider next time.

From "I don't know how to begin," to "my photos are terrible," to "I love this new system" to "this system has so many problems, sign me Disgusted," we heard from maybe 10 artists needing assistance and we held their hands until they were in.

My personal favorite was another nervous user. "I am so thrilled!" she said. "I got through the NRV Art Show entry process just fine, thanks to your help in getting started. I am amazed at how easy that organization made it for artists to get through the posting of art, payment, etc. I think it nothing short of a miracle for anybody to find out the existence of such a useful, well-planned website for show entries."

The thing we are most grateful for?

None of us were jurors with the difficult task of rating and selecting the final works!

But the best part about the jurying is that it, too, was done completely online. We, the administrators, loved the system and the jurors did, as well.

By the entry deadline, over 200 pieces were submitted. The variety of work is terrific and we can hardly wait to see the real thing open to the public on Oct. 2. Don't miss the reception on Oct. 18, 5-9 p.m. in Perspective Gallery inside the Squires Student Center at Virginia Tech. ■
